

Welcome to Seven Mountains Audubon 2019-20 PRESIDENT'S LETTER

The past decades have been difficult for birds. Many bird species, even ones we think of as common, have declined precipitously.

What with habitat degradation, warming temperatures, increasing numbers of catastrophic weather events, and human activities like use of non-native plantings, insecticides and pesticides, feral cats and buildings with bird-killing glass, it sometimes seems that the threats to our favorite species are insurmountable.

And yet...there is a change in the air. The latest opinion polls from Yale show a significant majority of Americans now recognize that climate change is happening and want the federal government to act on it. Soon Congress itself will realize it must act.

There are significant success stories out there. Think of the bluebird, which was threatened with extinction when I was a child; the bald eagle and peregrine falcon, which have made a real comeback after DDT was banned; and further afield, the Atlantic puffin, which is now breeding in good numbers on the islands off coastal Maine again. These successes show that we can reverse some of the worst declines with scientific knowledge and will.

We can't rest on our laurels, though. Birds, like humans, are sensitive to pollution of air and water. We must be vigilant to prevent protections of clean air and water from being rolled back. We must work in our own homes to provide bird-friendly plants and habitats to favor bird survival.

Our programs this year will help with ideas, while many will show the wonders of birdlife in America and abroad. I hope to see you at our First Saturday walks as well, when we get out and see the birds in their habitats. We invite you to join like-minded, bird-brained folks to enjoy and celebrate our beautiful, ecologically-essential birds.

Kay Cramer, President

SEVEN MOUNTAINS MEETING & PROGRAM SCHEDULE 2019- 2020

September 18, 2019 Doug Gross: The State of Pennsylvania's Birds

Doug will review the recent successes in bird conservation with species such as the Bald Eagle, Osprey, and Peregrine Falcon, and our current challenges with endangered and species of greatest conservation need. Some of these include Yellow-bellied Flycatcher, Golden-winged, Cerulean, and Blackpoll warblers, Wood thrush and Swainson's Thrush.

Recently retired as a Wildlife Biologist and Ornithologist from the Pennsylvania Game Commission, Doug has been involved with the monitoring and management of these species of concern, especially in our northern conifer forests. He is currently working on a study of the bird community of Rickett's Glen State Park with the intent of producing an annotated bird checklist and site guide. He and his wife live in rural Columbia County and enjoy gardening, nature study and traveling.

October 16, 2019 Jon Beam: Owls of Pennsylvania

Owls have been viewed as creatures of mystery and fear in various cultures through the ages. They are highly adapted to a nocturnal lifestyle, a time when humans seek warmth, shelter and light. Pennsylvania's owls range in size from large to small filling a variety of niches in the environment. We'll examine folklore, adaptations and natural history of owls that reside in our state both year round and those that only visit briefly.

Jon Beam was a naturalist for PPL at Montour Preserve for 24 years, offering educational programs to schools, scouts, special interest groups and the general public. He is currently Assistant Director for Montour Area Recreation Commission (MARC) and still offering educational programs about the natural world.
